Artistic Directors’ Note

Welcome to our 2019/20 season. This season we focus on questions of identity: Who are we? What are our values? What matters to us as individuals, as families, as communities, and as a society?

To begin that enquiry we are excited to be departing from tradition and producing two new plays that have been developed in the Antaeus Playwrights Lab. The Lab was created to support award-winning mid-career playwrights. Most of the year they meet on a weekly basis, coming with new pages from their latest play and Antaeus actors bring those pages to life. Last year we had our first LAB RESULTS, a reading festival of six of these new plays. All of the work was exciting, but two of the plays stood out as “Antaeus Plays.” They have the sweep of history and big ideas that make them universal and, well, classic. So we decided to take the leap and open our season with them running in rotating repertory. We haven’t done rep since 2007 when we moved into our space on Lankershim Avenue and we produced Noel Coward’s Tonight at 8:30, eight one acts over two nights. We believe you will find these plays as moving and important as we do.

Stephanie Alison Walker’s The Abuelas explores the awful repercussions of Argentina’s so-called “Dirty War” when the country was ruled by a military dictatorship. The World Premiere of Jennifer Maisel’s Eight Nights follows the poignant journey of a World War II Jewish refugee and her family through eight decades. We think these plays will be produced for many years to come.

We then finish our season with Shakespeare’s Measure for Measure and William Saroyan’s sprawling The Time of Your Life. We round it out with our monthly reading series, Classic Sundays, and our second annual LAB RESULTS. Please join us in finding tomorrow’s classics, and rediscovering how fresh and timely the great works from the past are.

If you are new to Antaeus, we are delighted to have you. If you are one of our old friends, welcome home. And now, enjoy the show.

Director’s Note

...“Terrible things are happening outside... poor helpless people are being dragged out of their homes. Families are torn apart; men, women and children are separated. Children come home from school to find that their parents have disappeared.”-- Anne Frank 1943

The purposeful use of children to punish the parents is not new. Violently separating children from parents, caging and abusing them, placing them with families sympathetic to the “regime” are all signature moves of dirty wars past and present. It is through this lens, of a child of the disappeared, that we are able to bear witness to the journey and the internal struggle of a human being fighting to embrace the real truth of their identity that was snatched away the moment they were born.

As in everything, humans seek to find higher ground.
We seek to find the road to healing despite the tragic narrative that is.
We honor those lost with the victory of living.

“Recovery of my identity is for me, an homage to my parents, a caress of my soul, a symbol of memory, truth and justice.”-- Javier Darroux Mijalcuk, recently found child of the disappeared

To this day, there are billboards in Buenos Aires that read: “If You Have Doubts About Your Identity, Call the Abuelas.”

In 1976, a military regime that would be responsible for the murder of an estimated 30,000 of its own citizens unlawfully seized power in Argentina. Led by General Jorge Rafael Videla, the junta staged a coup against a weakened government led by Isabel Perón, wife and Vice President to the recently deceased Juan Perón, under the premise that left-wing guerrilla revolutionaries were threatening their Western, Christian, and capitalist way of life. Those who were opposed to the reorganization were told “to make themselves invisible, or they would be made to vanish.” The junta called it a “war.” Historians today refer to it by its proper name — genocide.

In the first six months of Videla’s regime, there was an average of 30 abductions each day. From these abductions, a new word came into common usage: “desaparecidos,” or “the disappeared.” The government was unable to keep the disappearances hidden from the public, because almost everyone knew of someone who had a friend or loved one abducted. Very few of those kidnapped had any direct involvement in the leftist terrorist groups whose existence was the initial aim of the government’s extermination campaign. Others had only a tenuous connection to these groups – as friends, acquaintances, or sometimes just names found in the address books of victims. The typical sequence for those abducted during the Dirty War was disappearance, torture, and then death. Under the regime, detainees suffered at the hands of captors who had no incentive to return their prisoners alive.
At the Navy Mechanics School, Admiral Massera created the regime’s largest and perhaps most brutal concentration camp. Called the ESMA (Escuela Mecánica de la Armada), it was considered the “Argentine Auschwitz.”

Among those detained and tortured were young pregnant women. At both the ESMA and Campo de Mayo Hospital, the junta set up makeshift maternity wards where these women were either forced to undergo Caesarean sections or given serums to accelerate birth. During delivery, the women were blindfolded and tied to beds by their hands and feet. Their babies were given to “politically acceptable” parents – families with some connection to the regime. The regime was able to reap considerable profits during the Dirty War from illegal adoption because of the high number of pregnant detainees. This illicit business was so well-organized that some couples were able to choose their baby based on a captive mother’s looks and education. Descriptions of imprisoned pregnant women were provided to military couples seeking babies; those with fair skin and blue eyes were at a premium. Prospective adoptive mothers visited the detained pregnant women, ensuring that they received special treatment to promote healthy deliveries. Once born, the babies were given to their adoptive parents, and their real mothers were systematically killed, ensuring permanent severance of all biological ties. The junta’s goal was erasure of family identities.

Despite the atmosphere of fear that pervaded Argentina during the junta regime, two groups of women – representing the mothers and grandmothers of the disappeared – began protesting the disappearances of their relatives and striving for the reunification of their families. In this way, an initially small group of women spearheaded what became a catalyzing campaign to defy the repression of the junta.

The first group to form, the Madres de Plaza de Mayo – the mothers of the disappeared – embarked on a crusade in April 1977 to obtain information about their missing children, refusing to believe the government’s professed ignorance of their whereabouts. Six months later, the Abuelas joined the Madres in the search for missing children. While the Madres demanded both the return of their children and punishment for their captors, the Abuelas had a sharper focus – to find the living. They called them “los desaparecidos con vida” (the living disappeared), referring to the babies who were taken from the Abuelas’ murdered daughters and sons.
The Abuelas were not motivated by revenge, but by a desire to know that their grandchildren were alive and well. The Abuelas determined that more than 500 babies born in detention centers were adopted illegally, and they scoured hospitals and orphanages looking for them. They examined birth certificates and adoption records and attempted to gather information from doctors and nurses who attended the births. Their efforts, however, were often thwarted when those who gave information subsequently disappeared as well.

After years of being forced to tolerate the lies of the Argentine government regarding their children and grandchildren, the Abuelas, assisted by scientists and advocates in the international community, catalyzed a means for all citizens to learn the truth about their identities and, inadvertently, for the truth of the Dirty War to be exposed. Encouraged by the accuracy of forensic and DNA-aided identifications, the Abuelas successfully lobbied President Raúl Alfonsín and Argentina’s Congress to create the National Bank of Genetic Data in 1987. The first such genetic data bank in the world, it offered state-of-the-art services without charge to the relatives of disappeared children and to anyone whose identity was in question.

Due to the tenacity and courage of the Abuela’s efforts, 130 children of the disappeared have been found. Technological breakthroughs and legislative demands that came about in the process of their investigations have also been partially responsible for bringing the criminals of the Dirty War to justice, as well as expanding the rights of those who suffered at their hands.

Director’s Note

Eight Nights is a play that’s big enough for the times we live in. It explores both the small details of a life, and the currents that sweep across our globe... the people living in a tenement, and the unfolding of human history. The play calls us to action, but it also immerses us in the memory of our parents’ embrace. And it inspires us to give thanks to the ancestors that faced enormous hardships to come to these shores.

It has been a privilege to travel with Eight Nights from its birth to its World Premiere. I directed a reading of an early draft for the Playwrights Union First Peek challenge. Jennifer then developed the play at the Antaeus Playwrights Lab. The Moving Arts Company generously gave us space and funding to workshop the play further. Finally, Eight Nights was selected for the LAB RESULTS reading series last year, along with five other terrific plays that had taken shape with the help of Antaeus’ talented actors.

Thank you for braving traffic to come out and join this conversation, this gathering of souls. Let’s see where we go from here.

Auschwitz survivor Ilse Marcus recalled that growing up in the 1920s she experienced very little antisemitism. In fact, her family felt so secure in Breslau, which boasted the third-largest Jewish community in Germany at that time, that even when the Nazi Party came to power in 1933, the family stayed put. Her father was proud of his German nationality, believing himself and his family to be first-class citizens, and proclaiming that “Pogroms... were for Poland and Russia and other such barbaric lands, not the country of Schiller and Beethoven.” Then came the Nuremberg Laws of 1935, and when ever-increasing state persecution of Jews came to an undeniable height with the Kristallnacht pogrom of November 1938, many German Jews with the means to do so realized they needed to leave their home country behind. Thus, an international refugee crisis began.

Among the most infamous episodes of this time is that of the MS St. Louis — a Hamburg-American ocean line cruiser that set sail on May 13, 1939 from Hamburg to Cuba. Most of the 937 passengers were German Jews hoping to take refuge in Cuba until they could arrange for immigration to the United States, something that boatloads of Jewish refugees had done before them. But political divisiveness and corruption in Cuba were conspiring against them. Scandal broke out when it was revealed that the Cuban immigration director had been taking bribes to hand out “landing permits” for arriving refugees. Economic depression had fostered animosity among the Cuban people toward refugees, who they viewed as competition in a scarce job market. Antisemitic political organizations such as the Cuban Nazi Party had recently begun to gain traction, staging the largest antisemitic rally in the country’s history for a crowd of 40,000 people just five days before the ship’s departure. Newspapers stoked fear that the incoming refugees were Communists and criminals. In this atmosphere of mounting fear and pressure, Cuban President Federico Laredo Brú and his cabinet closed all loopholes to Cuba’s immigration laws and invalidated the permits being carried by passengers aboard the St. Louis.

As Cuban police barred the gangways and marked passports with a “Return” symbol, panic broke out on the ship. Some of the passengers had family just out of reach, waiting for them at the harbor or floating alongside the ship in chartered boats; in the end only 22 passengers were allowed to disembark. As the ship left the harbor, there were whispers of committing mass suicide. One passenger slit his wrists and jumped off the ship so as to be taken to a Havana hospital.

Rather than returning directly to Hamburg, Captain Gustav Schröder decided to make way for Miami with the hope that the refugees might be able to seek asylum in the United States. Passenger Liesl Joseph Loeb later recalled, “America was a magic word. It was the be-all and end-all. We knew America would not let us down.” When the ship reached Miami, it was prevented from docking and surrounded by US Coast Guard ships to stop any refugees from attempting to jump ship and swim to shore. A brief media frenzy ensued, the story making the front pages of The New York Times, The Washington Post, and many other prominent newspapers. Movie stars wrote letters to President Roosevelt pleading for him to take action. The children aboard the ship sent their own letters to Mrs. Roosevelt, and Captain Schröder sent a direct cable to the President himself, none of which received any reply.

As the United States had long hit their German immigration quota of approximately 27,000 for that year, the refugees on the St. Louis were unable to apply for standard immigration proceedings, and the President was unwilling to face the political repercussions of an executive order. The door was officially closed by the State Department on June 4, and a plea to Canada was met with a similar result. “If these Jews were to find a home [in Canada],” said immigration minister Frederick Blair, “they would be followed by other shiploads… the line must be drawn somewhere.” On June 7, Captain Schröder turned the ship back to Hamburg.

The passengers’ spirits were lifted, however, when the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee made arrangements with four major European countries outside of Germany to accept the refugees. Of the 908 German Jews who returned on the St. Louis to Hamburg, 288 wound up in Great Britain, while the other 620 were assigned to relocate to Belgium, France, or the Netherlands. Although they were initially overjoyed at their apparent salvation, they didn’t know that two-thirds of them were on their way to nations that would be soon overrun by the Third Reich.

Of the St. Louis refugees who returned to continental Europe, 254 were killed in the Holocaust, the majority of whom died in the killing centers of Auschwitz or Sobibór.

In an interview with historians Sarah Ogilvie and Scott Miller, who documented the fates of the St. Louis passengers, survivor Alice Olster asked, “Remember the garbage barge?” (she was referencing the trashpiled vessel that wandered the eastern seaboard of the United States for several months in 1987). “We were the human garbage barge.”

Antaeus Programs

PLAYWRIGHTS LAB
The Antaeus Playwrights Lab supports a select group of award-winning, mid-career writers as they develop the classics of the future. At weekly meetings, accomplished Antaeus Company actors bring our writers’ new pages to life. The Lab incubates new works that provide compelling roles for actors, and creates a nurturing and supportive artistic community.

New playwrights are brought into the Lab through referral; there is no application process at this time. However, we do have regular Open Houses when writers can share their work with us and actors can come play. Check our calendar for upcoming events.

The Lab Committee
Lab Director: Emily Chase
Playwrights Panel: Stephen Apostolina, Alex Goldberg, Jennifer Rowland

ACADEMY
The Academy trains the next generation of professional theater artists and serves more than 220 students each year. The program offers opportunities for both aspiring artists who want to develop essential skills and seasoned professionals who want to fine-tune their skills by giving them the chance to learn among a community of respected professionals. Classes cover topics such as scene-study, technique training, classical movement, voice, and improvisation, among others. Visit Antaeus.org/Academy for more information.

ODYSSEY ARTISTS’ WORKSHOP
The Antaeus Odyssey Artists’ Workshop is a creative writing and theater residency for at-risk youth and young adults that employs work from the classical canon to teach the structural elements of nonfiction writing as well as theater performance skills. By working with professional actors who perform classical texts in a style that resonates with students and breaks down themes from the chosen play, the program removes the perception of literature’s inaccessibility. It also gives students permission to express themselves and allows them to tell their own stories by using the universality of the classical characters, showing them they are not alone. Perhaps even more important is the program’s ability to help students gain, or regain, empathy.
